The training will help when making my announcements and emails accessible. I can help remind other people about the need for accessibility.

The reminder about the curb cut effect was great! I rarely think about how the things I do for accessibility might make it easier for other students.

The training provided details for improving accessibility of my online materials and assignments.

A good reminder to check accessibility on all documents and canvas.

I can apply what I learned when I create how-to guides and technical documentation.

I can change my fonts on documents & slides to make them easier to read.

The training helped me to better understand how to make my courses and materials more accessible and reasons why things such as contrast, spacing and alignment are so important.

More clarification on the function of heading tags when read by screenreaders.

Our department releases reports often and this can help make them more accessible.

I can immediately apply the information about what you can do in Google and Word to my work.

I think some training on the "low hanging fruit" of DEI would actually be helpful. What are some simple, low effort, but super effective things I can do in my classes to be more DEI-conscious? Trainings like that are minimally invasive, don't point fingers, but also remind us that DEI isn't this big bogeyman that requires a ton of effort. It'll also show what differences individuals can make in the community.

Hands-on workshops

More accessibility training, with demonstations of the accessibility checker resources.

Continued training & resources on accessibility

Anything.

I am interested in training on how we can do a better job of helping our male students of color.

Q8 - Do you have any other comments or suggestions related to diversity, equity and inclusion training?
